. . an ethnic minority is a substantial part of the population of a district . . . , the intensity and quality of ethnic voting are significantly affected . . . The results show that electoral outcomes in a district in which a substantial number of people are of minority ethnicity (i.e., that have experienced discrimination) are likely to be more ethnically polarized than in districts with a smaller proportion of people of minority ethnicity. . . . [This] means that political equality of an ethnic minority in a district with a large ethnic minority population is more likely to be better than in a district with a smaller proportion of the ethnic minority population This suggests that the presence of a substantial ethnic minority is a key factor These results reinforce the value of the 'remedial' redistricting approach of the Supreme Court's Vermont ruling.
